

The law has to be the same for everyone

Introduction

Rulo is friends with the boy of the head of the Land of Fun, Mr. Cobble. They are in the same class, they go to school together, and they play together.

Intrigue

In the Land of Fun, like in all other regions, you are not allowed to cross the street when the traffic lights show red. Only that this “you are not allowed” is only for some people. The law enforcement officers who patrol the streets know the son of Mr. Cobble very well.

Action

One this day, Rulo and the son of Mr. Cobble are leaving school together. They are walking home in a hurry and are discussing passionately about the history lesson that took place earlier that day. At a street cross, they look left, they look right, and they don't notice any car coming their way. Even though the traffic lights show red, they decide to cross the street in a hurry, but the patrolling officer spots and stops them.

Conclusion

After explaining to them the danger in which they placed themselves, the officer gives a ticket only to Rulo, but not to the son of Mr. Cobble.

As the two children leave for their homes, they are scared as they understand the danger in which they placed themselves by crossing a red light, and they understand that both of them should have been punished.

Explanatory conclusion

Why is Rulo the only one who received a ticket? Well... The officer knew the son of Mr. Cobble, and fearing retribution from the head of the land, did not punish him for crossing a red light. The two small robots were not equal before the law.

Questions

What would have happened if the officer would have enforced the law the same way for both Rulo and his friend? Should he have fined both of them? Do you believe that laws should be enforced equally for everyone?